

True Love

Lella Boutique

Love doesn't have to be loud. Sometimes, it's quiet and steady - the kind of love that shows up, grows roots, and feels like home. Woven with the charm of faded pages and countryside blooms, True Love feels like something discovered in a forgotten attic trunk. Bring a little sweetness to your sewing with vintage motifs, birds in branches, and a cozy, calming palette. Whether you're stitching for someone dear or piecing together a quilt that tells its own love story, this collection invites you to slow down and savor the sweet, steady rhythm of love that lasts.

...er not, who was ready to cry even that awful institution "the family" for her friend's

Rose read the note twice, and stood a moment pondering, with her eyes already fixed on the little boy before her window. The sight of several black figures moving briskly to and fro across its frozen surface seemed to suggest a mode of escape from the ice she dreaded in more ways than one. "That 'll be safe and pleasant," she said, and going to a desk wrote her answer.

"Dear Auntie,—I'm afraid of Bessie; but if Charlie 'll go skating with me, I should enjoy it very much, and it will do us both good. I can listen to the new plan with an undivided mind there; so give him my love, please, and I'll be glad to hear from you."

"Rose."

...er not, who was ready to cry even that aw-

Coming Home

Rose clapped her hands just as she used to do when any thing delighted her, and beamed at Mac approximately, as she said,—

"Now that's a criticism worth having, and we're much obliged. I was sure you'd admire my. But when you knew her; but I did n't believe you would be wise enough to see it at once; and you have got up many pegs in my estimation, I assure you."

"I was always fond of mineralogy you remember and I've been tapping round a good deal lately. I I've learned to know precious metals when I see them," Mac said with his shrewd smile.

"That is the last hobby, then? Your letters have amused us immensely; for each one had a new theme or experiment, and the latest was always the best.
Thought uncle would have died of laughing over it vegetarian mania; it was so funny to imagine you living on bread and milk, baked apples, and potato roasted in your own fat," continued Rose, changing the subject again.

"You ever loving "Aunt Clara."
Rose read the note twice, and stood a moment
pondering, with her eyes already fixed on the little boy before her window. The sight of several black

will do us both good. I can listen to the new plan with
say I shall expect him at once."

"Affectionately, "Rose."

Punctually at three, Charlie appeared with his skates over his arm, and a very contented face, which brightened wonderfully as Rose came downstairs in a red-tinted mist and scarlet skirt, so like the one she wore years ago that he involuntarily exclaimed as he told her she was—

"You look so like little Rose I hardly know you, and it seems so like old times I feel sixers again."
"That is just the way one ought to feel with a day as this. Now let us be off and have a good spin before any one comes. There are only a few children here now, but it is Saturday, you know, and every-

"This old chap was the laughing-stock of his They called him Don Quixote, and the way it at windmills of all sorts was a sight to see." Charlie, evidently feeling that Mac had been on the head quite as much as was good for him "But in spite of that she Don get through with all the honors. Oh, wasn't I proud when Jane wrote me about it and did n't she repeat her boy says at the head of his class, and a medal!" cried Rose, shaking Mac by both his a way that caused Charlie to wish "she did had been left behind with Dr. Alec."
"Oh come, that's all mother's nonsense."

Preface

As authors may be supposed to know better than any one else what they intended to do when writing a book, I beg leave to say that there is no more to this story. Rose is not designed for a model girl; and the Sequel was simply written in fulfillment of a promise; hoping to afford some amusement; and perhaps here and there a helpful hint; to other roses getting ready to bloom.
