The case for growing nectar-rich plants in your garden this spring

BY THE OPTIMIST DAILY EDITORIAL TEAM

The nectar created by flowering plants is a significant food source for many of the critters we share our environment with. Those of us who want to attract wildlife to our gardens understand the importance of having flowering plants in bloom for as long as possible.

Selecting nectar-rich plants is also a good idea because it can help us provide for insects, other pollinators, and predatory insects where we reside. These choices also assist us in providing for ourselves and our families.
